They are all issues that the ruling class has carefully and skillfully framed so as to make one half of the US population view the other half as its enemy despite the fact that when framed properly (as I do in my linked articles about these issues) it turns out that about 80% or more of the population is in either agreement or close enough to make a friendly compromise possible were it not for the ruling class working hard to make sure that never happens, which is its divide-and-rule strategy of social control.

Until we expose the phony designed-to-be divisive frameworks and start using contrary unifying frameworks as I discuss, we won't have the unity we need to seriously challenge the power of the ruling billionaire plutocracy.

Ignoring these divisive frameworks, by saying it's just a "distraction" to talk about them, is a huge mistake--one that the ruling class hopes we will keep making. It would be like saying that when someone is coming at you with a knife that it would just be a distraction to deal with the knife, since the "main problem" is the evil intent of the attacker. Yeah, right.

If we keep making this mistake, we will never be able to win and hold onto the substantial improvements that we want. The ruling class will keep us weak and divided against ourselves. Let's not let the ruling class get away with that!
